Rev 1.
Generally we do not print local studies related to one place or country, unless the research is really unique. Fortunately this is the case. One may say that child marriage occur not only in Indonesia, however the problem do exist and may be a good subject for a scientific paper. But there is one big obstacle. Although the term sustainable development is visible in the title of the work it is unfortunately invisible in the basic text. So, the paper in its present version was not prepared from the perspective of sustainable development. This however may be corrected. One of the basic questions is what does it mean for a child to get married. Is it improving the chances for better life or quite opposite. What are the mental consequences?

Rev 2.
The article deals with very important social issues of child marriage. The data is up-to-date and properly analyzed. The drawback is the poor connection of the issue with sustainable development. Children's marriages are more of a legal, political and, above all, social problem. There is also an exaggerated domination of purely statistical content over the substantive one.
I propose to publish an article in the Problemy Ekorozwoju, but on condition that the issues will be clearly related to sustainable development, the statistical content will be limited to the necessary minimum and after deepening the interpretation and conclusions.
